

Building a Content Foundation from Scratch

Shokworks

ROLE	FOCUS
In-House Content Strategist	Content Strategy & Thought Leadership

The Situation

When I joined, Shokworks was still finding out who it was. The company knew the solutions it provided and had already built a robust network — but in a market full of SaaS companies making similar promises, that wasn't enough to stand out. The real challenge was differentiation.

Working closely with the founder, I helped develop the idea of a "Shokworks ecosystem" — a framework for explaining not just what the company offered, but how it worked with clients to build solutions together, rather than simply selling a product off the shelf. At the same time, the company needed to establish itself as a genuine thought leader within the tech community, all without alienating the less technical clients who were just as core to the business.

The Approach

I worked with the marketing team to build a 360-degree content strategy: SEO-backed web copy, long-form blog articles, case studies, and pitch decks all working together. A key part of the process was working directly alongside the engineers and developers doing the actual technical work — sitting with the concepts long enough to understand them myself, so I could translate them for a general audience.

Articles went out weekly, built around trending topics in business, tech, and cybersecurity. The goal was twofold: establish real authority in a technical space, and make complicated topics feel approachable rather than out of reach for companies that weren't deeply technical themselves.

The Results

The clearest signal came from the sales team itself — we gave them the tools to pitch in a relatable, human way, with relevant case studies and assets ready for any conversation. We also helped them deliver these ideas directly to potential clients. On top of that, the blog steadily increased inbound traffic, and staying active across social platforms kept the company visible and consistent in front of its audience.

Why It Worked

The key was meeting the audience where they were — finding common ground and using that to build real connection. We had to strike a balance between establishing trust and thought leadership while staying relatable, never straying outside the scope of less technical clients. These services had value for nearly any business, and every customized solution was built to be genuinely original to the client it served.